However, some authors have suggested that the rates are much higher, and that offences by young people account for up to 50% of offences against children and 30% of rapes of adolescent girls and adult women (Barbaree, Hudson, & Seto, 1993; Becker, Harris, & Sales, 1993 cited in Burk & Burkhart, 2003). This illustrates that young people are the offenders in a significant

Broadly speaking, adolescence is understood to mean the period between childhood and adulthood. Although the precise age range it encompasses is debatable, it is agreed that during this period young people experience rapid physical and cognitive growth, reach puberty, and move from the relative security of childhood to confront an array of social and other life challenges. Adolescents are ...

- Young people who offend are often known to children's social care services. Hopkins, Webb, and Mackie (2010) analysed completed Asset and Onset profiles of young people who were convicted or deemed at risk of offending and found that 43 per cent had had previous contact with children's social services and 15 per cent had current contact.
