school classes. You may find that law school learning differs significantly from your other educational experiences. One of the most notable differences is the format of the text books. Most law school texts are likely to be unfamiliar territory for many law students because they are in the form of "case books." Case books typically are ...

Rather, the purpose of a law school course (and of law school in general) is to teach you how to "think like a lawyer." Thus, while you will ultimately learn the law,¹ you will also learn how to find the law in the cases and how to apply the law to new factual situations. As the purpose of a law school course is different from the purpose of an
