In his review of the book Emma's War in the October 20 New York Times, George Packer; note author's name is not given; it's "Deborah Scroggins"-ap got to the essence of continual media indifference to the horrors of the National Islamic Front "jihad" against the blacks in the south: "The deaths of 10,000 southern Sudanese by slaughter or 100,000 by starvation can occur with hardly a ...

Emma's War is part journalistic nonfiction, part biography, part memoir. In its function as a distant discussion of the Sudanese civil war that's been raging for decades, it did a fine job. As an American, I don't usually understand clearly the many layers of strife that underlie conflict in distant lands and cultures, and Ms. Scroggins attempted to explain what is both complex and somewhat ...
