Quite a few recent models are rapidly introducing new concepts describing different levels of consciousness. This situation is getting confusing because some theorists formulate their models without making reference to existing views, redundantly adding complexity to an already difficult problem. In this paper I present and compare nine such models to highlight points of convergence and ...

the consciousness, or awareness, is constituted by the representation of the target state. To be conscious of seeing the tomato is to represent that one is seeing it. The difference, again, has to do with whether this representation of the fact that one is seeing it takes place in a separate state or is a feature of the visual state itself.
