In spite of its relative under-prioritisation in development assistance, few dispute the power of communication, and in particular the catalytic role of the media, in influencing governance relationships and processes: communication is widely seen as vital for connecting states with society, facilitating inclusive political systems, giving 'voice' to poor and marginalised groups, and ...

Member States must fulfil their positive obligation to protect media freedom and the safety of journalists by using all necessary means to end physical and verbal attacks on media professionals. I welcome the fact that this issue is addressed at the Ministerial Conference, and reiterate the call that it is vital to ensure freedom of expression in general and freedom of the media in particular.

11/1/2018 · With respect to politics, citizens seem to learn about politics even when they are not looking for political information (Tewksbury, Weaver, and Maddex, 2001; Zukin and Snyder, 1984). Yet this sort of incidental exposure arguably is becoming rarer as more media choices enable better screening of information in which one has no interest (Prior, 2007).

16/4/2019 · Concerns about public misinformation in the United States—ranging from politics to science—are growing. Here, we provide an overview of how and why citizens become (and sometimes remain) misinformed about science. Our discussion focuses specifically on misinformation among individual citizens. However, it is impossible to understand individual information processing and ...
