The trilogy published during the 1980s -Cities of the Red Night (1981), The Place of Dead Roads (1983), and The Western Lands-confirms this assessment by extending Burroughs's criticism of "the whole either-or proposition" to a sweeping refiguration of the history and destiny of the West, imagined now in the persona of a writer-narrator who would escape Western civilization, not by dissolving ...

8/12/2020 · Abstract: In this article, I draw on William S. Burroughs' The Western Lands to think about what François Laruelle has termed a "generic humanity." This generic humanity broadens and expands our ethical obligations towards those who have not yet been included in humanity. Burroughs' emphasis
