Many people like to drink wine when they eat out, and higher-class restaurants often employ a wine steward or sommelier who helps guests pair wines from the wine list with the food they order. Traditionally, red wines are paired with darker meats like steak, roast beef and duck, while white wines and light reds are paired with lighter meats like chicken, fish and seafood.

The person with dementia may not eat because food may not smell or taste as good as it once did. Make mealtimes calm and comfortable During the middle stages of Alzheimer's, distractions, too many choices, and changes in perception, taste and smell can make eating more difficult.
